Addressing Horn of Africa's Security Challenges

Security in Somalia: A Review of 2022

2022

SUMMARY

2022 was marked by the transition to a new administration in Somalia, the subsequent formation of a new government, and a civilian uprising against Al-Shabaab (AS) that began in Hiraan over the summer but took root in September. However, despite the widely reported offensive operations in support of the civilian uprising, it would seem this did not make a marked difference in the number of security incidents rather there was a massive increase in the number of casualties as a result of the fight against AS in 2022 compared to 2021.

The majority of security incidents increased dramatically in 2022, with some occurrences practically doubling compared to 2021. Al-Shabaab (AS) was very active during the end of the year, increasing the frequency of raids and IED attacks. Notably, the number of assassinations carried out by AS rose, as did the number of grenade attacks and ambushes, in comparison to 2021. AS increasingly targeted the majority of its perceived foes, such as regular and special Somali National Army (SNA) forces, officials or civil servants, elders or delegates, civilians, and Macawisley militias. With a few exceptions, the allied forces were unable to conduct a sufficient number of counter-operations in response to AS.

2022 saw AS conduct one of its most combined operations: 954, according to Hiraal's tally. While Hiraal cannot corroborate the government's assertion that 3000 AS fighters have been killed with an additional 3,700 AS fighters wounded – which would leave the AS with zero combatants according to Hiraal's last AS strength estimates - sources confirm that each side has lost at least 1,500.

Initially, the new government was focused on supporting local insurgencies in HirShabelle against AS. However, a fragmented response allowed AS to reorganise and adapt. Consequently, numerous subclans have now signed peace accords with AS, and the likelihood of widespread uprisings and the toppling of AS by local actors is diminishing.

NON-PROFIT

The year 2022 began with a noticeable decline in Al-Shabaab (AS) raids in Somalia. However, raids swiftly rose again in February, peaking in April, which coincided with the holy month of Ramadan. AS typically intensifies its activities leading up to Ramadan, and the first four months of 2022 were no exception. From May onwards, the number of AS raids fluctuated, with another surge occurring in December. The primary targets of AS were the Somali National Army (SNA) regular forces, followed by the African Transition Mission in Somalia (ATMIS) troops and the Somali Police Forces (SPF).

In 2022, in response to AS, the SNA forces, in combination with the Macwisley militia, were the most active actors. Nevertheless, the total number of SNA operations decreased significantly from 2021 to 2022, with 39 operations compared to 59 in 2021. Between 2021 and 2022, American airstrikes were constant, with a modest uptick in the latter quarter of 2022. With one exception in November, when the Kenya Defence Forces (KDF) targeted AS militants in their hideouts on the outskirts of Badhaadhe district in the Lower Juba region, ATMIS conducted no large-scale offensive operations against AS.

In 2022, the security situation in Somalia was marked by a dramatic increase in AS attacks that appeared unchecked by countermeasures taken by partner forces. AS maintained a consistent activity level throughout the year, with noteworthy surges in attacks leading up to Ramadan and at the year's close. Compared to 2021, several types of attacks, including vehicle-borne improvised explosive devices (VBIEDs), person-borne improvised explosive devices (PBIEDs), and grenade attacks, exhibited varying degrees of change. AS altered its geographical focus throughout the year as it worked to quell uprisings and divert government attention. In addition, AS increasingly targeted civilians and specific groups, such as the regular and special forces of the Somali National Army (SNA), the Somali Police Forces (SPF), and the Macawisley militias, among others.

Despite considerable improvements in allied responses, particularly by SNA special forces and Federal Member States (FMS) counter-operations, the overall effectiveness of these measures remains limited. This analysis examines attack trends, the focus of AS operations, and the allied response to provide a thorough view of Somalia's security situation in 2022.

Trends in Attacks

AS attacks seemed to be uninfluenced by allied operations; they continued as usual and increased across the board. The group was most active in the first few months of 2022, especially in the run-up to Ramadan and towards the end of the year. On the contrary, the least active months for AS operations were October and November. The only exception to this was SVBIED attacks, which in these two months increased to 14 attacks - a vast majority of the annual total of 25 attacks. AS maintained low but stable numbers of PBIED attacks, ranging from 0 to 2 per month, a trend that has continued since 2021.

Similar to 2021, the number of VBIED attacks remained low during the entire year of 2022. Compared to 2021, the number of shellings by AS was similar, albeit with a slight decrease. In 2022, though, AS increased its grenade attacks by more than double from 40 in 2021 to 88. This was prominent during the first half of the year, from January to May, then again between August and September, in stark contrast to July, when no grenade attacks were recorded.

Most notable is the significant increase in ambushes by AS in September. In September, thirteen incidents were recorded, compared to a maximum of five each month across all other months. September was also high in IED attacks, which almost doubled compared to the first few months of 2022. Finally, October and November had fewer raids compared to the entirety of 2022 and most of 2021. In December, however, the number of raids rocketed sharply to an almost all-time high.

AS began the year by focusing its attacks in Galgaduud and Mudug, where it extended its advance towards the western part of Galmudug State. However, after encountering an uprising in the Hiran region, it redirected its focus there in an attempt to quell the insurgency. It ultimately concentrated the majority of its attacks in Hiran and Middle Shabelle, where it faced a combined local and government offensive. Likewise, it intensified its attacks within Mogadishu in an attempt to divert government attention.

AS Focus

AS focused its lethal operations primarily on SNA regular forces, followed by the Somali Police forces and ATMIS troops. There has been a significant increase in attacks aimed at the SNA regarding both regular and special forces compared to 2021. While attacks on regular SNA troops went up from 174 attacks in 2021 to 260 attacks in 2022, attacks targetting SNA's special forces tripled between the two years. Attacks on the SPF remained high but constant compared to 2021.

AS's increased focus on civilians, including officials, civil servants, elders and delegates, is concerning. In all these categories, the number of assaults increased, most notably against elders and delegates, where the figure more than tripled in 2022 compared to 2021. AS also had to react to Macawisley militias gaining momentum in 2022. AS launched 18 attacks against the militias in 2022 compared to only two in 2021.

As mentioned above, ATMIS troops have continued being tragically inactive in combatting AS. Nevertheless, they remained one of AS's main targets in 2022. This was the case, particularly in April and December – AS's two most active months of 2022. On the contrary, again corresponding to the above-mentioned, October and November were AS's least active months overall, including attacks on ATMIS.

Responding to AS

The allied response has been slightly improved since 2021, which can be illustrated by an increase in counter-AS operations, specifically of the SNA special forces and the Federal Member States (FMS) forces. The number of US airstrikes against AS in 2022 stayed consistent with 2021, oscillating between 0 and 3 every month. Operations of the SNA regular forces decreased in 2022; however, this could be a result of the SNA's increasing cooperation with the Macawisley and not a decrease in SNA activity.

In 2022, SNA's regular and special forces and Macawisley militias were responsible for over fifty percent of all operations against AS. The number of ATMIS operations remained consistently low throughout the year, culminating in a single operation in November. Notably, though, ATMIS has achieved a certain level of security in Somalia. Its primary objective is not to combat AS but rather to transfer security responsibilities to Somali troops by 2024.

Unfortunately, allied operations had minimal impact on AS assaults. After slowing down in October, the gang maintained its operations, adapting to allied attacks and strategies, as shown below.

CONCLUSION

The security situation in Somalia in 2022 demonstrated a persistent and concerning pattern of Al-Shabaab (AS) attacks, despite countermeasures by allied forces. AS continued to conduct attacks, concentrating on SNA regular forces, Somali Police forces, and ATMIS personnel in particular. The group's heightened targeting of civilians, including officials, civil servants, elders, and delegates, highlights a troubling escalation in its tactics.

AS demonstrated adaptability by shifting its focus across regions in response to local uprisings and government offensives. The group attempted to divert government attention by increasing attacks within Mogadishu, underscoring its ability to exploit security gaps. Trends in various attack types, such as VBIEDs, PBIEDs, and grenade attacks, suggest that AS is continually refining its strategies.

In response to AS, there has been some improvement in the allied response since 2021, particularly in the SNA special forces and Federal Member States (FMS) forces' counter-operations. However, the overall effectiveness of these efforts remains limited, as demonstrated by the persistently high levels of AS attacks throughout the year. The number of US airstrikes against AS remained stable, while regular SNA forces' operations emerged.

The outlook for 2023 is dire and can be surmised from the increased attacks in the first quarter of the year. The group has ramped up its attacks on SNA and FMS bases across the country and appears to be on control of the countryside surrounding the government-liberated settlements. We assess that this will continue to be the case, even if the group loses the major population centers.
